'The model of policing in this country is based on consent and we remain acutely aware of the high standards that are required to maintain the public's trust,' said Bernie O'Reilly, the College of Policing's interim CEO.

'The overwhelming majority of police officers and staff act with the highest integrity and abhor corruption. The Panel has acknowledged the vast majority of officers act honourably and do not break their rules or engage in corrupt activity and they do very difficult, and, at times, dangerous work.

'Often it is officers and staff who make reports about behaviour they have witnessed by another colleague and they should be supported with an investigation into allegations of wrongdoing.

'Changes we have established mean that officers joining the police today will be rigorously vetted and their continued service or promotion is based on assessment of their values and behaviour against the policing Code of Ethics. Officers dismissed from the service are placed on a barred list preventing them from re-entering the police.

'Our focus is on supporting the vast majority of officers who work with integrity to keep the public safe, while making sure there is the right culture, training and standards in place nationally to prevent, detect and deal with corruption. We owe it to the Morgan family and the wider public to continue this work in light of this report and ensure corruption has no place in modern day policing.'

Supporting ethics and integrity

These measures to tackle corruption, brought in by the College of Policing, apply to all forces in England and Wales.

- Barred list – the public can search for people who have been dismissed from policing through the Police Conduct and Performance Regulations
- National counter-corruption guidance for all forces
- Counter-corruption course for investigators involved in serious and organised crime
- National guidance for officers to maintain 'a professional boundary' between them and the publicNational guidance for officers to maintain 'appropriate personal relationships' with colleaguesVetting Code of Practice – to ensure the right people get into the service
- We set national standards of behaviours for forces to follow when undertaking recruitment, assessment or development
- Code of Ethics – setting and defining the exemplary standards of behaviour for everyone who works in policingWe are jointly responsible for investigating eligible 'super-complaints' regarding issues associated with a particular feature of policing in England and Wales or where a 'systemic' problem has been correctly identified
